International News in Brief

U. S. electronic monitoring stations may be set up in Norway.

The White House is considering the establishment of such stations to make certain the Soviet Union complies with the new Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty, government sources confirmed. This measure was among a list compiled by U.S. intelligence agencies in the last two weeks as methods of monitoring Soviet missile tests, the sources said. The installations would help make up for the loss of listening posts in Iran, closed earlier this year by the new revolutionary government, and a possible refusal by Turkey to allow U-2 spy plane flights near its border with the Soviet Union.
